COLLEGE REPORT

By ROBERT M. BERSI
Assistant to the President
California State College, Dominguez Hills

Before a community can take effective steps to solve its common problems, it is necessary for opinion leaders in that community to agree about what those problems are. One of the primary functions of the Community Conference on Environmental Problems and Urban Design and Beautification was to provide some sense of the attitudes of local citizens and community planners toward what presently needs to be done in confronting urban problems.

More than 200 laymen, business men, politicians, and professional planners participated. Opinions were of great variety, as were ideas for solving specific situations. At one end of the spectrum, a number of people expressed the conviction that the Los Angeles area is now quite beautiful and distinctive—that we have no major urban problems in the area of environmental design and should leave well enough alone. It was agreed that the main purpose of a city is to be a place for people to be happy and function economically. Residents of every community were urged to ask themselves if their city is providing this kind of atmosphere.

Most of the participants in the discussion group appeared to accept the idea that it is appropriate for various communities to evolve some sort of statement of goals and then strive to win public support for achieving these goals. The public should be involved in the initial steps of planning. Once a statement of objectives has been written, it can be submitted to various citizens' groups and civic organizations for comment and criticism. The statement of goals may be circulated through the communications media so that the general public learns of it and comments are solicited. Political and industrial elements should participate in revising the list of objectives. The final statement as much as possible should represent a general consensus of the community. No statement of goals, however, is adequate without means of implementation.

TO CARRY out proposals, communities need at least the tolerance of the general public, the approval of the press, the cooperation of local educational institutions, the momentum provided by enthusi-
